For gigging guitarists, having a backup guitar on hand is standard practice – no one likes standing around in silence watching the guitar player change a broken string! However, lugging around an extra gigbag or hard case can be a pain. Mono Cases is a company that prides itself on designing and making just about the best hybrid soft/rigid instrument cases going, and this design basically combines two of its M80 electric guitar cases in a single package.

It's no slapdash job, either. Both compartments feature extensive padding and support. In particular, the patented neck brace design is a very well-thought-out feature. This basically consists of a solid, cushioned block supporting the neck and suspending the headstock of each guitar so that it isn't taking any strain whatsoever and doesn't move around unnecessarily during transit. The large additional compartments are big enough to throw a few stompboxes into, and the whole outer skin is waterproof, just in case you get caught out by the weather. Padded shoulder straps are there to help you carry the load. This gigbag features near flawless construction. We're really impressed by the protection it offers, and the fact that it can carry two instruments at once easily and without compromise is fantastic. The M80 Dual Electric Case comes highly recommended, and if this sample is anything to go by, we'd bet the rest of the range doesn't do too badly either.
